Body

The relief was palpable from Berlin to Munich when Germany announced its GDP figures yesterday. After months of gloom, modest growth of 0.4pc in the first quarter was heralded as a sign Europe's largest economy might weather the global slowdown better than most experts predict.

For the first time in six months, Germany is growing again, and the figures follow last week's announcement that exports rose unexpectedly by 1.5pc in March. That such lean figures are seen as something to celebrate is a clear indication of how Europe's industrial powerhouse has slowed - and behind the numbers lurk unpalatable truths.

That there is any growth is down to the service sector and a construction boom fuelled by housing shortages. The manufacturing sector that is the engine of the German economy, in particular its fabled car industry, is in trouble. Automotive orders fell 5.3pc in the first quarter. In mechanical engineering, the outlook is more bleak, with orders down 7.3pc.
